

Bundle your services and save on your long distance charges

There are many reasons to bundle services these days including:

- the ability to customize bundles to fit your needs.
- creating additional savings as you add services.
- getting only one convenient monthly bill.

Potentially, customers can save hundreds of dollars a year by purchasing a bundle. Phone, cable and Internet companies offer special pricing on bundles in an effort to get you to buy more than one service. Not only is that good for them, but its also good for you. Bundling services means you only have to maintain one relationship versus multiple relationships with multiple companies. That also means one bill. And when you have a problem, there is only one phone call to make.

If you're considering bundling your services, decide what you need and shop around. In the end, you'll get what you need and save money in the process.

Getting the Most From Your Business Communications Plan

Large corporations are faced with trying to identify high-tech services that can help them improve their overall business performance. One solution could be professional consulting services.

Fortune 500 and small business owners need an end-to-end partner to help them address complex business issues such as expansion into new markets both nationally and globally, data management issues, obsolete infrastructure, and security issues and needs. As a result, IT support has never been more vital to helping companies achieve their business goals.

The new trend is working with a consultant versus bring these capabilities in-house. Many companies provide advanced communications and IT solutions to a variety of businesses and organizations, designed to assist management with developing solutions focused on five areas: Security Services, IT Services, Network Integration and Engineering, IP Communications and Contact Center Services.